Sunday Reflection – Preparing for the Banquet

The First Reading prophesies a restoration that will bring bounty to the whole world; the veil of death and the reproach of God's people will be removed forever. This period of peace and prosperity is likened to a great banquet that the Lord would provide, one of rich food and choice wines, great joy and security; where all would be well on God's holy mountain. The Second Reading shows St Paul's total openness to God's will. He displays great equanimity and balance, with no concern at all for physical circumstances. Sometimes in his travels of evangelization he was hosted by very wealthy people, other times he was so destitute that he didn't know where his next meal would come from. Serving the Lord was always his main concern.

In today's Gospel, we again find the banquet theme. It foreshadows how the Lord Himself will nourish us. Many are invited to the Lord's banquet, to salvation, but many refuse the invite and lose their opportunity to share the heavenly banquet. Perhaps weakness or the tendency to choose sin over good, causes them to reject the invite, making them unworthy of attendance. So, the king invites the good and the bad to the meal, and they are expected to make themselves ready (convert their hearts). The guest who is not properly dressed represents those who refuse to change their ways, and by so doing exclude themselves from the banquet. May we, through the grace of conversion, be well prepared and ready for the heavenly banquet when the Lord calls us.
